

I really loved studying about Andy Warhol. He once earned a living designing packages and Christmas cards. He was very bland and boring but turned household things made into contemporary or pop works of art. I really enjoy vintage items and his artwork has an expressionistic brushing that give them a vintage look that look so good in my house. Another artist that caught my eye was Jeff Koons, like Andy Warhol questions the separation of high art and low culture. One of his paintings called Triple Hulk Elvis III really stood out to me because my son is so into Marvel characters right now so I was interested to read more. I love how it has the same look of Andy Warhol's that it blurs the boundaries between high art and low art culture that includes kitsch overly sentimental work that is viewed as tasteless decoration but that has its own sort of nostalgic charm. All of these works of art are beautiful in their own different way that seem so interesting to me.
